Highly refined hardware with a beautiful all-metal finish. Excellent battery life. Sense has been streamlined even further, with a cleaner Blink interface and new launch gestures. Good speakers for a phone. But camera still disappoints. Some of the features are gimmicks and not useful beyond impressing the other guests at the pool party. Skip the plastic Dot case accessory — it's cool, but way too expensive.

Blazing fast A7 processor. Call quality is excellent, especially using FaceTime Audio. Touch ID feels like the future, and works flawlessly. Vastly improved camera, particularly the slow motion feature, is enough to warrant an upgrade. Still waiting for Siri to reach her full potential.

OK Google, your voice activation and navigation make for a great Bluetooth co-pilot in my car. Auto-just-about-everything, from photo and video editing, to letting me know the latest scores. Simply the best reading and video viewing experience there is on a handset, period, the end. The price is nice for an unlocked device.

Amazing camera with a bunch of dedicated apps. Outstanding audio recording. Bright, vivid screen makes for a nice outdoor viewing experience. Slightly bigger than other 6-inch screen phablets. Polycarbonate body feels cheap. Design doesn't stand out. At all.

Water and dust resistant. Spectacularly bright display with great contrast and wide viewing angles. 3050 mAh battery easily lasts all day. It's crazy big. Odd dock connector location on the left-hand side. Like on the Xperia Z, the tempered-glass front and rear panels are still huge fingerprint magnets. Grainy low-light photos.

The Motorola Moto G is a mid-range handset with a low-end price tag and it's quite simply the best budget phone around.
